

Claudia Hahn is PhD student at the University of Basel, in the Sustainable Land Use group.

I learned to present my research to a non-researcher audience. It was very interesting to experience in what biology teachers are interested in (the larger content and especially methods and tools). Through helping to prepare and explain hands-on experiments I learned to explain ecophysiological processes in a much simpler way than usual. Apart from highly technical devices that are generally used in research, ecophysiological processes can easily be explained and made visible with the help of quite simple and elementary experiments. In general I would say I improved my skills (through Carole as an example and via my own experience) in communicating science.